FORSYTH, MO.

This site, once occupied by prehistoric Indians, was later inhabited by Osage. A village of Delawareans lived here in 1806, and a tribe of Miami occupied it in 1823. The first white settlers reached the area via canoes, keelboats and flatboats. Later, groups came via the White River Trace or the Salenash Military Road.

Taney County, established 1837, was named for Maryland's Roger Brooke Taney, Chief Justice of U.S. Supreme Court 1836-1864. Four of six courthouses stood on or near this site. One was abandoned; fire destroyed two; a fifth fell to Bull Shoals Lake impoundment. Forsyth was named for Georgia's John Forsyth, Andrew Jackson's Secretary of State.

The historic Carrollton (Ark.)-Forsyth-Springfield road, opened in the mid-1830's, was the main north-south route across the upper White River valley. It was used extensively by both Union and Rebel forces in the Rebellion and later became an important commercial road.

Forsyth, a noted river port, served White River commercial interests for over a century. The Yohogony was the first steamboat to reach Forsyth. The next year, 1853, the Ben Lee made four trips. In the three decades that followed, other steamboats served the Forsyth area.

The first military engagement in the upper White River valley during the Civil War occurred here July 22, 1861, when Brig. Gen. T.W. Sherman's Union troops marched on the town, routed the Rebels and captured their supplies. Three 12-pound cannon balls left gaping holes in the three-story brick courthouse. All other buildings were left intact. As Unionists left, Confederates returned, remaining until April 10, 1862, evacuating the town upon the approach of Gen. S.R. Curtis' Union forces. After 12 days, the Federals marched to Batesville, and the Rebels reoccupied the town. Following the Battle of Prairie Grove, the Union army returned to Forsyth, arriving on Jan. 19, 1863. The inhabitants again deserted the town, offering no resistance. This time the Union army fortified the town. Breast-works and block houses were made with logs from local buildings. A stockade enclosed the courthouse as protection against an expected attack that never came. When the Union forces withdrew, April 22, 1863, they destroyed the town and all fortifications. Only the burned-out walls of the courthouse and three graveyards remained. The dead were later reinterred in the Springfield National Cemetery.

Forsyth was the focal point of the Bald Knobbers--one of the nation's most colorful vigilance committees.

FORSYTH, MO.

This area was occupied by prehistoric Indians. It was later settled by Europeans. In 1800, the first permanent settlement was made. The white pine, poplar, and flathead pine were the main crops.

Town was established in 1837 and named for James Brooke. It had a population of six thousand in 1850. The destroyed buildings were replaced. Forsyth was the largest town in the state in 1850.

The historic location of the White River bridge was the main north-south route. It was used extensively by the Union and Rebel forces in the Rebellion and later became an important transportation route.

Forsyth, a noted river port, was the largest river commercial center in the state. In 1850, the town had a population of seven thousand. The following year, 1851, the town had a population of seven thousand.

The 1850 military engagement at the river bridge was during the Civil War. It occurred on July 25, 1861, when Gen. T. W. Doniphan's Union troops marched on the town, captured the bridge, and destroyed the three-story brick courthouse. All other buildings were left in ruins. As Unionist men, confiscated weapons, remaining until April 10, 1867, evacuated the town upon the approach of Gen. S. R. Curtis' Union troops.

After 12 days of fighting, the Rebels evacuated to Batesville, and the Rebels reoccupied the town following the Battle of Francis Springs. The Union army returned to Forsyth, arriving on Dec. 19, 1865. The Unionists were ordered to leave the town, offering no resistance. This time the Union army looted the town. Great works and blood were shed with great loss of life.

A blockade enclosed the courthouse as protection against the Rebels. The blockade was maintained until the Union army withdrew April 22, 1863. The blockade was maintained until the Union army withdrew April 22, 1863. The blockade was maintained until the Union army withdrew April 22, 1863.
