GENERAL DAVIDSON'S CAVALRY

General Davidson held his troops here waiting for reports from hired spies regarding road conditions and the strength of Confederate forces between Bloomfield and Little Rock. The troops were kept busy with drill, picket duty, drill, foraging parties, drill, digging and erecting fortifications, dress parades and MORE drill.

His orders were that no soldier could enter a private home or take private property unless ordered to do so. Soldiers found little to take, indicating that Bloomfield residents were subsisting mainly upon cornmeal and bacon. A few soldiers reported that they found a few chickens, some butter and a few vegetables.

At dress parade on July 18, the men of Davidson's command were told to strike their tents and prepare to move south at 8:00 a.m. on July 19. The men seemed happy to leave the area after camping so long in the July heat of southeast Missouri. It is safe to assume that the residents of Bloomfield were pleased to see the 6,000 Union soldiers and their horses leave.

A consequence of the "occupation" of the community by General John "Black Jack" Davidson and his large force was that the 1864 gardens of Bloomfield were said to be the most productive in history.

GENERAL DAVIDSON'S CAVALRY

In June of 1863, Brigadier General John W. Davidson received orders to take command of the newly formed First Cavalry Division, Department of Missouri, (U.S.). The division consisted of 6,000 cavalrymen, thousands of horses, 15 pieces of field artillery and numerous supply wagons. The soldiers came from Missouri, Illinois, Iowa, Ohio and far-off Colorado. Their mission was to join Union infantrymen in east central Arkansas and move west into the state's interior to capture the Confederate stronghold of Little Rock.

This large force moved from Missouri's Arcadia Valley to assume control of Crowley's Ridge in southeast Missouri and northeast Arkansas. This ridge had the only all-weather road through the huge swamps and wetlands of the area. Bloomfield was the largest and most prominent Missouri town on the ridge.

When Davidson's command reached Bloomfield, they discovered the town of approximately 100 people to be nearly deserted. A Union soldier wrote in his diary, "Bloomfield was once a very pretty town, but since the war has been totally demolished." (Actually the academy, the courthouse, a few businesses and homes remained at that time. Later everything except the academy was torched by bushwhackers during Price's Raid in the fall of 1864.) For 12 days,
