A LONG ROAD HOME

Wagon Train Escapes

The wagon train miraculously survived the day. General Smith's 6,000 infantrymen veered north and missed intercepting it. The Union brigade, dispatched by General Pleasanton to destroy it, was repulsed, then later lured by a "bottle line" of unarmored recruits, and finally turned back by a grass fire set by the Southerners.

No Time to Bury the Dead

Dead and wounded were left on the fields to be gathered up by local farmers. (One mass grave was near 55th St. and Ward Parkway.) John Wornall's home (61st St. Terrace and Wornall) served as field hospital for both sides.

Disaster Strikes at Mine Creek

On October 25, Union cavalry caught the Confederates crossing Mine Creek in Kansas, 65 miles south, and killed and captured many. General Price burned one-third of the wagon train the next day to speed retreat. On October 28, the Union attacked again in Newtonia, Missouri. They ended pursuit at Fayetteville, Arkansas, November 7.

After enduring cold, starvation and smallpox during their march across the Chickaw Nation, the raiders finally disbanded at Laynesport, Arkansas, December 2, 1864.

Southern resistance in the West was broken. The Battle of Westport was the last major Civil War battle west of the Mississippi. More than 30,000 men fought; approximately 10,000 Confederates and 20,000 Federals. Some estimate that 3,500 were killed or wounded, though no one knows exactly.
