Strike at Byram's Ford

An angry Union force along the Big Blue seemed for attack. After a brief toward the north, Union lines to the south, the Confederates struck at mid-morning, south, at Byram's ford before being driven across the river. The battle succeeded, but the Confederates found a small unopposed ford nearby, crossed and struck the Union flank. The Federals retreated. The river had been crossed.

BREAKTHROUGH AT BIG BLUE RIVER

That afternoon, action was scattered across a wide area extending to the state line. Fighting at Mackbee's farm (78th) and Holmes) was very fierce with high casualty. A thundering Confederate cavalry charge there finally routed the row, but persistent Kansas militiamen.

Back in Independence, Union General Pleasanton was pushing the Confederate rear guard through the town. Because of this pressure, General Price later directed his train of captured goods (600 wagons, 5,000 head of stock), and his 3,000 unmixed recruits southwesterly.

Little Rest

For Weary Men

That night, few men slept. Pickett's dashed units were positioned and issued ammunition, and many, thinking of conscripts, stared into campfires during the chill night.

Strike at Byram's Ford

At sunup, Union forces along the Big Blue braced for attack. After a feint toward the main Union forces to the north, the Confederates struck at mid-morning, south, at Byram's ford (where 63rd St. crosses the river). The battle seesawed, but the Southerners found a small unguarded ford nearby, crossed and struck the Union flank. The Federals retreated. The river had been crossed.

That afternoon, action was scattered across a wide area extending to the state line. Fighting at Mockbee's farm (78th and Holmes) was very fierce with high casualty. A thundering Confederate cavalry charge there finally routed the raw, but persistent Kansas militiamen.
